'Jazz Age' exhibit adds mural

MTSU art professor and alumnae paint mural for 'Entering the Modern Era: Murfreesboro's Jazz Age'

By SHAYNA HERRING
Contributing Writer

Erin Anfinson, assistant professor of art at MTSU, along with alumnae, Emily May-Ragland and Sarah Sullivan, have volunteered to paint a new mural for the Heritage Center of Murfreesboro's new exhibit, "Entering the Modern Era: Murfreesboro's Jazz Age."

Anfinson has previously done work for the Heritage Center and will be working with May-Ragland and Sullivan on the 6 feet by 20 feet mural that will set the tone for the exhibit.

"I am pleased with how it is coming along so far and especially with the students' work," Anfinson said. "It is a great opportunity for them to gain professional experience."

The exhibit's focus is the shaping and transformation of the community in the 1920s, the thrill of the Jazz Age.

Anfinson said that with this piece she would be able to create a "speakeasy kind of feel" and wanted alumnae to work with her on this particular project.

In addition to working on the "Entering the Modern Era: Murfreesboro's Jazz Age" exhibit, MTSU students have also designed and created the concept for another exhibit entitled "The Time that Changed Everything: Murfreesboro's Civil War Era," which was completed in November 2007.

Anfinson and the students will continue to add layers of acrylic to the painting in order to make the 1920s scene unfold by portraying dancing couples in "roaring '20s" fashion twirl across the art deco background.

In her research for the project, Anfinson honed in on art deco patterns and influences from artists of the time period.

Melissa Zimmerman, heritage preservation specialist for the Center for Historic Preservation, said she has high hopes for public's reaction to the exhibit.

"I hope the mural will add the flavor of music, fashion, art style and the feel of hot jazz to the exhibit," Zimmerman said.

Visitors are welcome and encouraged to come as well as observe the artists as they work on the mural.

The Heritage Center, located just off the square at 225 West College St., is devoted to commemorating Murfreesboro's history and raising awareness in the community.

They are currently expanding "Entering the Modern Era: Murfreesboro's Jazz Age", which was their first permanent exhibit, that was completed on May 15, 2007.

The expansion of the exhibit and the mural are set to be finished in mid to late August; however, anyone can visit the exhibits for free during the hours of 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., Monday through Friday.

MT faculty teach college-level classes to prisoners

By ALEX MOORMAN
Assistant News Editor

MTSU, along with the Tennessee Department of Correction and the Great Books Foundation, have joined together to form a program to teach classes in local prisons called Great Books in Middle Tennessee Prisons.

The program began in late March and took place at the Riverbend Maximum Security Institution, the Lois M. DeBerry Special Needs Facility and the Tennessee Prison for Women. The program incorporated volunteers from MTSU's English faculty, including Philip E. Phillips, associate professor of English.

"Educational opportunities that include critical examination of texts and thoughtful discussion of great ideas abound at Middle Tennessee State University, and such opportunities enrich our students' minds and lives," Phillips said.

Phillips applied for and received an MTSU Public Service Grant for $2,701 and $250 from the College of Liberal Arts for the pilot initiative of the program.

Working along side Phillips as volunteers were Warren Tormey, Becky King, Laura Dubek, Rhonda McDaniel and Tricia Gaitely.

The process of trying to set up the programs in the prisons began in January after Daniel Born, of the Chicago-based Great Books Foundation, visited the Riverbend and DeBerry facilities.

Sharmila Patel, head of the education department for the Tennessee Department of Correction, took Born on a tour of the prisons and described the need for programs like Great Books in Tennessee prisons.

"I feel like it really enriched our lives and it really enriched theirs too," said Rebecca King, an English

Diane Miller selected as vice provost for academic affairs

By ALEX MOORMAN
Assistant News Editor

Diane Miller has been named MTSU's new vice provost for Academic Affairs after formerly being interim vice provost for the past year.

Miller, a professor of Mathematics, received her Ph.D. in Mathematics Education from the University of Missouri, Columbia.

"Well I was in the position that I had before but now I'm permanent," Miller said.

Miller has been interim vice provost for academic affairs for three years before now. She served from 2002 through 2004 and was asked to come back in January of 2008 to serve for a period of time as interim.

Miller said she didn't know how long she'd hold that position because a national search was conducted for a replacement so she also decided to apply for the position in hope of holding it permanently.

"We interviewed three candidates but ultimately she was our best applicant," said Kaylene Gebert executive vice president and provost at MTSU.

Miller said her responsibilities include all matters dealing with curriculum issues on campus, so if a department wants to form a new major or a new degree program, there's a process on campus to which that request has to be approved.

In addition to new degree programs, Miller said that the Office of Academic Affairs also handles grade appeals.

"There's a number of directors that report to this office like African-American Studies, Aging Studies, Women's Studies, and the director for transfer students just to name a few," Miller said. "There are a number of other offices on campus that report to me."

In addition to currently serving as the interim vice provost of academic affairs and taking over the position permanently in the fall, Miller also serves as director

Crime rate at MT is public record; can't always access

"In the early morning of April 5, 1986, Jeanne Cleary, a 19-year-old freshman at Lehigh University was suddenly awakened in her dorm room. She was then sexually assaulted and brutally murdered by a fellow student she did not know. Her attacker cut her throat with a broken beer bottle, kicked her, sodomized her, bit her cheeks and breasts and then strangled her until she died."

This case summary is taken from the third edition of "Covering Campus Crime," a manual published by the Student Press Law Center as a tool for college journalists to maintain a strong, ethical and frequent coverage of criminal acts on campuses.

Following Jeanne's murder, her parents discovered that the campus police force had been aware of numerous violent acts committed on campus, of which the student population had remained largely unaware.

To battle this injustice of ignorance, the parents founded a non-profit organization called "Security on Campus, Inc." The group helps other victims of campus crimes and fights for better open record laws to allow public access to safety information.

The law Congress passed, known as the "Jeanne Cleary Disclosure of Campus Security Policy and Campus Crime Statistics Act," requires that campus police stations maintain an updated campus police and security log, and release annual statistical reports of campus crime.

MTSU, like all other universities, holds an open campus police and security log. Like many other university newspapers, Sidelines publishes a list of "crime reports" on a regular basis as a service to our readers and the campus public. We want everyone to be aware.

The job of the police station is to maintain, organize and update its crime log. Unfortunately, that task has left much to be desired and, on more than one occasion, has left the newspaper and our readers with incomplete or no crime briefs whatsoever.

When we went to retrieve the log around 3 p.m. on July 22, we discovered it had not been updated since July 8 - they hadn't even added the briefs they gave us last week. A dispatch attendant grudgingly helped our editor flip through the log and eventually found a log containing an incident from July 14 - buried at the bottom with incident reports from the spring semester.

Even if the last entry, which was grossly misplaced in the log, was July 14, it does not account for the absence of campus police and security logs from July 15 until July 22.

Last summer, Sidelines had a break between our June 27 issue and July 11 issue for the Fourth of July. When we went to gather crime briefs on July 10, we found that they had not been updated since June 28.

Two weeks.

For 14 days our campus was left with no information on the state of our security. Someone could have been raped, murdered, savagely beaten and no one would have been the wiser. So we did what any ethical journalists would do - we complained.

In response, Chief Buddy Peaster, the current head of the MTSU Department of Public Safety, issued a typed letter to our office recognizing the mistake.

"I have reviewed our current policy regarding maintaining a crime log for inspection, and I have implemented safeguards to insure that crime listings will be accurately up to date according to proper University and federal standards," Peaster wrote in his Aug. 2, 2007, letter.

Peaster was very professional and cooperative in his effort to enact change. Unfortunately, the department has fallen back into its old practices and forgotten about Jeanne Cleary.

If anyone has ever read our "Crime Briefs" section and not seen their incident - but was a victim of a crime - speak up.

If you have been wronged by a criminal action that was not publicized via the open record acts or the Jeanne Cleary Act - speak up.

If you are a victim who did not see your assailant handled by the proper authorities or were not given the privilege of facing your attacker in a court of law - speak up.

We can help you speak up. It seems insignificant, but even something as simple as a traffic violation will help students be knowledgeable about dangerous intersections or unsafe roadways.

It is our right as college students to feel safe in our dorms, in our labs, in our classrooms and on our campus. It is our right to know when something happens, even little incidents, to cause us to be unsafe or to raise attention about a safety issue.

Believe everything and you'll be right half the time

Friday night was quite the letdown.

I met up with some high-school friends from Alabama at an all-night diner. I'd hardly seen any of them in the last few years, but now they're all finishing engineering degrees.

For the most part I'm happy for them, but I found myself shocked by some of their politics.

These kids aren't idiots - they obviously took harder maths than me, right?

Still, they were wrong about a lot of things. I don't mean they saw things differently; I mean the evidence they cited was flawed.

For example, they oppose universal healthcare on the grounds that it lowers the quality of treatment everywhere it's implemented, and especially in feckless France.

But in 2002, nearly twice as many people died of treatable illnesses in the United States as did in France.

Also performing better than the States were Canada, Britain, Scandinavia - the boggymen of socialized healthcare. This from the January/February issue of Health Affairs.

Of course, the engineers at the diner argued healthcare in the United States is fine, provided you can afford it - and if you can't, that's probably your fault anyway. Yes, someone really did use the words "survival of the fittest" here.

Now, I contend that a poor

Tired of Fighting Daniel Potter

man's life is more important than a rich man's wallet, no matter who works harder.

But even if we ignore the complex reality that poverty isn't exclusively a failure to capitalize on opportunity, the fact remains that such opportunities are shrinking, according to data aggregated in the New York Times' series "Class Matters."

Further, anecdotally, a good friend of mine is uninsured. The daughter of drug addicts, in college on student loans while working, I knock on wood just writing about her because until she graduates she simply can't afford to be diagnosed with much more than indigestion.

In other words, survival of the richest punishes all those still struggling to get there, and that is un-American and unacceptable.

Still, the guys I went to high school with argued capitalism is the ideal system, even when the chips in play are human lives. One said it's "worked the best so far."

Define "worked the best," friend!

Before civilization, our ancestors worked only a few hours a day, and lived that way for aeons without ever once bringing Earth to the brink of ecological collapse.

But oops, there again is a sticking point - after all, the guys argued, anthropogenic climate change is a myth.

Mankind isn't to blame for global warming, they continued, and even if the temperature is increasing it's too late to change anything.

Never mind that the United Nations says global warming not is not only "unequivocal" but "very likely" caused by humans.

In fact, even the Bush administration has acknowledged its reality, after an entire first term of procrastination veiled as skepticism.

Bush, the guys argued, is a tool.

Finally, we agreed on something!

Still though, I think it says something about a person's politics when George W. Bush holds a view that's ahead of theirs on the curve.

Anyway, even if we throw out my argument that our species is bound for unimaginable catastrophe within our lifetimes depending on our actions, civilization is still a mistake.

This is because our entire culture is predicated on chasing the carrot on a stick known as profit, and profit is purely illusory.

Profit occurs when someone selling something exter-nalizes a production cost.

To borrow from the short film "The Story of Stuff," which you can watch online for free, an example of an externalized cost is workers who, with no other option, go to work in factories full of toxic chemicals.

Of course it would cost the company to protect workers from these chemicals, but it doesn't matter - They externalize the cost instead.

That is, the harmful consequences these workers suffer from dealing with such chemicals becomes their own problem, so consumers can enjoy a cheaper product.

Another example occurs when the factory is outsourced overseas, so those toxic chemicals can ravage someone else's ecosystem, and thus externalize that cost as well.

Those clowns I graduated with were the ones to point out that profit essentially can't happen unless someone down the line is short-changed.

Maybe they're OK with that, but I'd hardly say it's what works best.

Anyway, the evening ended with me writing down my e-mail address so one of them could send me proof of WMDs in Iraq.

He hasn't written yet.

What happens to our college money?By ELIZABETH GUYE
Contributing Writer

Every semester, students empty their bank accounts or take out loans to pay MTSU thousands of dollars to attend school. Most students do not ask where their money is going because it's usually assumed that you're paying for a college education.

However, now that there is a 6 percent tuition increase for the upcoming school year, students are starting to wonder, where does my tuition go?

"I assume my tuition goes to classes and education but I never really questioned the issue because I just knew to go to college you have to pay," says Kyla Holder, a sophomore interior design major.

For the incoming freshman class, the estimated tuition cost is $2,885 a semester if the student is going to school full time, is in-state and is not living in a campus dorm. If a student comes to MTSU this fall from out of state, the estimated cost for them is $8,485 a semester. If a freshman lives in a dorm, they are also required to pay for housing and for a meal plan, which can get up to about $6,000 or $7,000 a semester.

Mike Gower, vice president for business finance, lays out the following explanation on how MTSU's money was made and distributed for the 2007-2008 school year.

MTSU made revenue of $235,730,200. The majority of this money, or 51 percent, came from tuition costs and fees, 43 percent came from state appropriations, or money set aside by the government for universities, and the remaining six percent came from other sources.

WHERE DOES YOUR TUITION MONEY GO?

63%

ACADEMICS

14%

STUDENT SERVICES

10%

INSTITUTIONAL SUPPORT

8%

FACILITY SERVICES

5%

OTHER EXPENSES

All of these revenue sources are put together in a general fund and then distributed within various expenses. With students' tuition payments totalling a little more than half of all the revenue the university obtains, it plays a crucial part in providing for our expenses as a university.

MTSU's expenses are distributed between five different areas. The majority of revenue, 63 percent or $146,652,800, goes to academics, which includes instruction, research and academic support. These costs pay professors, fund the library provide and classroom necessities.

Academics is an area a lot of students are concerned with, and many people might agree this area should be where most of their tuition goes.

"I would hope a lot of the money goes to the teachers," says Denise Moore, parent of incoming freshman journalism major Lindsey Moore. "I'm a teacher myself, and I know how much a struggle it can be."

The next highest is recipient is student services, which receives 14 percent, or $33,068,400 of the total revenue. This includes departments such as counseling services, transfer student services and most other services.

Institutional support takes 10 percent of the revenue, or $22,265,500, for business and finance, development, technology and other administrative departments. Examples of these expenses would be administrative salary, campus construction and computer labs.

The next department to receive funding is facility services. It gets 8 percent, or $17,487,700, of revenue. It is comprised of custodial services, maintenance, utilities, construction management and campus planning.

The remaining 5 percent goes to other various expenses. This makes the MTSU general fund for last year $232,190,700.

Most students see the overwhelming statistics and might think they shouldn't need to pay 6 percent more in tuition this coming fall and may not understand where this increase is going to go.

Jeff Osment, incoming freshman, says he thinks that the 6 percent increase will be used for campus upkeep and professors' salaries. Some students may agree with Jeff and assume that's where the extra money is going. But that doesn't mean students like having to pay more money.

"I'm not happy at all about tuition going up," says Elena Serrano, junior marketing major. "When I graduate, I'm going to have to pay about $25,000 in students loans."

Tamesha Hudson, a recent graduate who started attending MTSU in 2003, says she didn't enjoy paying tuition increases.

"Ever since I've been coming here, it seems like tuition has gone up every year," Hudson says. "I feel bad for the people coming in now because it's just going to get harder and harder."

The 2008-2009 tuition increase of 6 percent will be thrown in with the rest of the revenue and distributed like it was last year with a little more prominence in the academic services. The percentages will change slightly due to the increase in academic expenses, but not drastically, and academic expenses will increase slightly over the next few years.

The increase is to compensate for the budget shortfalls and will help MTSU become a better university.

Tuition is essential to attending college. Everyone has to pay it and it just becomes so natural that people rarely ask where their money is going. MTSU would not be recognized as such a great institution without the tuition we pay every year.

Two MT players voted first team all-Sun Belt; MT picked fifth

By RICHARD LOWE
Sports Editor

Middle Tennessee's road to the future looks bright according to observers of the Sun Belt Conference. Coaches and media members elected juniors Desmond Gee and Alex Suber to the SBC all-conference team Monday.

"We are very proud of Desmond and Alex and feel they are very deserving of the recognition," head coach Rick Stockstill told MT Media Relations.

Gee, an all-purpose player from Greenville, Fla., has been elected to the postseason all-conference team the past two years as an all-purpose player. Last year, Gee led the team in all-purpose yards with 1,323 yards while sharing time at wide receiver, running back, and kick and punt returner. He was second on the team with 29 receptions for 382 yards and four touchdowns while also adding 162 yards on the ground.

Suber, a cornerback from Tampa, Fla., was named honorable mention in last year's postseason all-conference team. He was second in tackles with 59 while adding 7.5 tackles for loss, an interception, five pass breakups, three forced fumbles, and two fumble recoveries.

Florida Atlantic University led all teams with eight players selected to the all-Sun Belt team. Its quarterback, Rusty Smith, was selected as the preseason offensive player of the year while Frantz Joseph, a linebacker for FAU, was selected as the preseason defensive player of the year.

Troy and Arkansas State

each had five players voted onto the preseason team. Three players each represented the University of Louisiana and Louisiana-Monroe.

Even though the future is considered bright for MT, coaches and media members believe that this will be a down year for the Blue Raiders. They are picked to finish fifth out of the eight teams in the conference.

Picked to finish first is last year's conference co-champion, FAU. The Owls return 18 of their 22 starters from last year's team that went 8-4 and defeated the University of Memphis in the R+L Carriers New Orleans Bowl.

The biggest challenger to FAU's crown will be the University of Troy. FAU defeated the Trojans in their season finale to secure their share of the conference championship. Since joining the conference in 2004, the Trojans have only finished worse than second twice. They return 14 starters on a team that defeated Oklahoma State University and came within 10 points of defeating No. 10 University of Georgia.

The only other team to receive a first place votes was Louisiana-Monroe, who finished last season winning six of its final eight games, including wins over FAU and the University of Alabama.

The conference football season begin Aug. 28 when Troy visits MT in their annual Battle of the Palladium. Troy is currently riding a two game win streak over the Blue Raiders, including a one-point victory that clinched a share of the Sun Belt crown for the Trojans.

of MTSU's Undergraduate Center and as the director of the McNair Scholars Program.

Miller is known internationally for her expertise in mathematics education. She most recently coordinated MTSU's first highly successful U.S.-Sino Conference on Mathematics and Science Education.

"In addition to being in a leadership position, this position is also one of service to the university including the dean and the faculty and the students," Miller said.

She said the Office of Academic Affairs works with students that may have complaints about a professor, classes or something else that may not be working for them at the university.

"They are referred to me so that I can help them with their concerns," Miller said.

"She's very proactive and she works well with students and keeps their interests in mind," Gebert said.

"I've always been student-centered in my approach to higher education," Miller said.

Miller was hired in August 1993 as an associate professor in the mathematics department and was then promoted to full-time faculty member.

"When I first started I didn't have any thoughts of entering higher education administration," Miller said. "But through different circumstances I was given leadership positions and one decision led to another and eventually to this appointment."

Gebert said Miller is a very hard worker and she knows MTSU very well and is committed in strengthening academic programs.

"I feel quite fortunate being given the opportunity to serve the university in this role, and I think it's partly because I'm a very student-oriented person and a service-oriented person," Miller said.

professor and program volunteer. "The discussions we had every week were very rich and brought together people from really different backgrounds, so we got to hear different kinds of insights."

King said the students had read a lot of relevant books and had a real high level of education.

"The classes started preparing prisoners to reflect critically upon the choices that they make and the values that they embrace," Phillips said. "There are many in our society, however, who have had few, if any, meaningful educational opportunities to cultivate their minds in this way or even to see the value of the 'examined' life."

Phillips said they were trying to expose the students to literature because a lot of these students had never had to option of taking college level classes.

"The classes are not for college credit but they are college-level, and I think that will really help these students in the future," Phillips said.
